

Cooling

Lowering the Operative Temperature

Cooling

When a space experiences a rise in its operative “comfort” temperature it tells us the building efficiency can no longer protect us from further weather changes and/ or the ventilation air is too hot and we must now begin to remove heat from the space and/ or ventilation air in sufficient quantities to keep us comfortable. The quantity of energy removed is usually measured in “tons”.